By Jim Knowles

San Leandro Times

Margaret Buckley knows how to put newspapers to good use at the Moore Street Fish Market in Dublin where she's worked for 46 years.

"I came into town for a cup of coffee and I've been here ever since," Buckley says. "I've been here since I was a child bride."

The fish Buckley sells come from all around the Irish Sea.

"You should have the Irish smoked salmon," says Buckley. "You can't beat it with some Irish whiskey."

Buckley's parents and grandparents were in the fish industry but she's not sure if the business will continue for another generation in her family. It's one of the last open-air fish markets left.

Mackerel is the main fish caught around Ireland, along with cod, herring, salmon, whiting, scallops and Dublin Bay prawns.

Unfortunately, just as the fish industry has done in the rest of the world, many fish "farms" are now established on the west coast of Ireland.

These corralled fish, mainly salmon, are becoming a bigger part of the fish industry.

But the Moore Street Fish Market mainly sells fish caught in the open sea.

“I’m the third generation, maybe the next generation will take over,” Buckley says as she rushes off to the next customer.

CAPTION: Margaret Buckley wraps fish for a customer at the Moore Street Fish Market the way fish was mean to be wrapped, in a newspaper.

PHOTO BY JIM KNOWLES